On Lake Kampeska

THE LEGEND OF LAKE KAMPESKA

When Watertown people talk of water they are usually discussing Lake Kampeska, the 5,000-acre lake that is actually part of the city.

The lake's legend began at Stony Point on Kampeska's south shore. The small peninsula was once a Sioux campsite; arrowheads can still be found there. Near the point is a pile of rocks called Maiden's Island.

Minnecotah, a beautiful Indian maiden, lived on the banks of Kampeska. Though wooed by many young men in her tribe, she was in love with a warrior from the Wahpeton tribe. Elders of the tribe instructed her to choose between the young men of her own tribe. To delay her decision and perhaps to buy time, she suggested a rock-throwing competition. She would marry the man who threw the largest rock the farthest into the lake.

An island of rocks grew in the lake as the men competed for Minnecotah. Eventually, the elders realized her ploy so they took her to the rock island (now called Maiden's Island) to either choose a suitor or die of hunger. She stayed on the island, surviving on fish delivered in a mother pelican's pouch. Eventually, her lover rescued her and they lived happily ever after.
